8 places your next client is hiding

A cheat sheet for finding local businesses that need a website. Most people only try one (Google Maps). Use three. Every source here is public. Never use an owner's personal phone, email or home address.

---

1. New business licenses (be first in the door)

Most cities publish every new business license as open data, often updated daily.

- Find it: search `"[your city]" open data "business license"`, open the dataset, sort by issue date.
- Good lead: a storefront or service business that opened in the last 30 days. Skip home-based licenses, renewals and chains.
- First move: "Congrats on opening. I noticed you're not on Google yet / don't have a site, so I made you a preview."
- Scale: Chicago issued 286 new business licenses from October 15 to 28, 2026. In a spot check of 12 new shops and restaurants (Oct 2026), 8 had no website or weren't on Google Maps. Where to find your city's list: the free "Where 30 cities publish brand-new businesses" PDF.
- Automated by the free `find-new-businesses` skill.

2. Great reviews, no website (Google Maps)

- Find it: Google Maps › `[trade] in [town]` › look for listings with no Website button.
- Good lead: 20+ reviews at 4.5★ or better. Busy and trusted, missing the obvious. Check with a quick web search that they really have no site (some link Facebook instead).
- Scale: in our test, 32 of 115 Chicago handymen had no website (Oct 2026).
- Automated by the free `find-clients` skill.

3. Broken or outdated websites

They already paid for a website once, so they get it.

- Look for: domains that don't load, "Not secure" warnings, error pages, "this domain is for sale", © 2019 in the footer, no mobile layout.

- First move: lead with the screenshot of what their customers see today. Confirm in a real browser first: never pitch a false alarm.
- Scale: 10 of 70 Chicago handyman websites we checked were broken (Oct 2026).
- Automated by the free `find-broken-sites` skill.

4. Reviews that complain about the website or booking

- Find it: in their Google or Yelp reviews, search for "website", "book online", "couldn't find", "hours were wrong", "menu".
- Good lead: a recent review where a customer struggled online. The owner already knows it's a problem.
- First move: quote the problem (not the reviewer's name), then show the fix.

5. People asking for help online

- Find it: `site:reddit.com "[city]" "web designer"` (or "website"), your local Facebook groups, Nextdoor, local "gigs" listings.
- Good lead: a post from the last few months by a business you can identify.
- First move: answer the question helpfully in public first. Offer help only if it fits. No copy-paste pitches.

6. Partners who serve the same owners

Other people get asked "do you know a website person?" every week.

- Who: accountants and bookkeepers, insurance brokers, business bankers, sign shops, printers, photographers, commercial cleaners, local IT people.
- First move: "I build websites for [trade] in [area]. When your clients ask you about a website, can I be the person you send them to? Happy to send people your way too."
- Make it easy: a one-page referral card, and a thank-you (or a referral fee, in writing) for every client.

7. Rooms full of owners

- Where: chamber of commerce mixers, networking chapters (BNI and similar), trade association meetings, local business expos, a talk at the library ("Get found on Google").
- First move: ask about their business, not yours. Show a preview site on your phone only when they ask what you do.
- Goal: one real conversation and one follow-up per event.

8. Your own network (the warm 50)

Word of mouth is still the #1 way local owners get new customers (35% in BrightLocal's 2026 survey of 1,002 owners), and in a GoDaddy survey of 204 owners who'd hired a web pro (2021), 73% found them through recommendations.

- Do it: list 50 people you know (family, friends, old coworkers, your barber, your mechanic).
- Ask: "Quick one: who do you know who runs a business with no website, or an old one? I'm helping local businesses get found on Google." That's it. Don't pitch them, ask for the introduction.

The 20-in-20 routine

20 minutes a day, 20 leads in a simple sheet (name, trade, area, source, why they need it, phone, next step):

- 10 from Google Maps (source 2)
- 5 broken sites (source 3)
- 5 new licenses (source 1)

Then contact the best 5 the same day. Walk in or call before you email.

Free skills that automate sources 1 to 5: github.com/WordRocket/local-client-finder (the `client-agents` skill runs five of them at once and picks your top 3). Follow local anti-spam and calling rules (CAN-SPAM and TCPA in the US, CASL in Canada, PECR/GDPR in the UK/EU): one personal message per business, stop when they say no, no cold texting. Data: City of Chicago open data and our Google Maps checks, Oct 2026; GoDaddy "What clients want" survey (2021); BrightLocal Small Business Marketing Report 2026. Results vary.